STOLEN RIDE

"SAY, Plas," Woozy said, beaming, "this is sure a snazzy new car! When are we going for a ride in it?"

"This car," Plastic Man said in mock seriousness, "was given me so I could help smash a stolen car ring operating in the city."

"I want you to drive the car down to Lower Ninth Street, park it and come back home. Now go upstairs and get the keys. I have other business," Plas concluded.

A short time later, Woozy drove to the appointed place.

"I don't know how Plas expects to catch a gang of crooks by putting a snappy car like this where they can steal it," he grumbled, climbing out.

Woozy had barely left when a pair of flashily dressed, hard-faced men sauntered past the car.

"Say, Slim," the shorter of the two whispered, "take a look at that job . . . sixteen cylinders, red leather upholstery and all the extras. The boss'd give us a bonus for a crate like that."

"What do you know, Blackie," Slim chuckled, "the dope left the keys in the ignition."

Glancing cautiously up and down the street, the two men opened the right front door and slid in.

Not long afterward Blackie pulled the car up to the truck entrance of an old warehouse in a deserted section of town and tapped the horn button twice lightly, then once in a long blast. Immediately the corrugated iron door rolled up enough to admit the waiting car. The men got out and made their way to the lighted office to the left of the entrance.

Entering, Blackie said, "Say, Boss, you ought to see the car we picked up tonight . . . it's a beaut."

The huge, hulking man at the desk looked up sullenly.

"You guys better be careful how you drive up here," he said in a hoarse voice. "Somebody mighta tailed you here."

"Naw," Blackie assured him, "we know better than that. Come on out, Spider, and take a look."

The big man heaved his bulk from the squeaking chair and went to the spot where the car had been parked.

"Say," he said, eying the luxurious sedan appreciatively, "you guys are right. I got a date with Ruby at the Pirates' Den tonight. This will knock her eyes out."

"With a new set of plates and a quick-dry paint job," Blackie put in, "it'll be all set for tonight."

An hour later, the camouflaged car rolled out of the old warehouse and headed for town. Blackie was at the wheel with Slim sitting beside him, while Spider lolled comfortably in the rear seat.

"Say, Blackie," Spider rasped, as the car reached a nintersection and continued straight through, "you shoulda turned left there."

"I know," Blackie replied worriedly, "but the steering wheel wouldn't turn. It's like somebody had a hold of it."

"Well, slow down at the next corner," Spider ordered, "and turn there."

He had no sooner spoken when the car leaped like a frightened deer and roared straight on down the street.

"I can't do a thing with it, Boss," Blackie shouted desperately. "It won't stop."

The three car thieves held on as the runaway car raced around corners on two wheels to the center of town, finally pulling up in front of an impressive building on the main street.

"Whew," Blackie gasped in relief, "it's stopped."

"Get it out of here," Spider roared, "we're in front of the FBI office."

Then, apparently from nowhere, came two long arms, one pinning the men in the front seat, the other pushing the struggling Spider back against the cushions in the rear seat.

"Yipe!" Blackie shrieked, "Plastic Man!"

"In the flesh . . . er . . . plastic," the rubbery nemesis of crime grinned, craning his head over them triumphantly. "I suggest you come to headquarters peacefully or it will give me great pleasure to splatter you."

"We'll come," Spider grunted in resignation, "if you'll tell me one thing . . . how did you hide in the car when we went over it with a fine-tooth comb when we painted it?"

"I hate to give away trade secrets," Plastic Man chuckled, "but if I were you, when I get finished serving time, I'd be mighty suspicious of plastic auto seat covers."
